

LYNN CHADWICK

Out of the Shadows:
Unseen Sculpture of the 1960s

FOREWORD

Since my childhood in Africa I have been fascinated and stimulated by Lynn Chadwick's work. I was drawn both by the imagery and the tangible making process which for the first time enabled my child's mind to respond to and connect with modern sculpture in a spontaneous way. I was moved by the strange animalistic figures and intrigued by the lines fanning across their surfaces. I could see that the lines were structural but also loved the way they appeared to energise the forms they described.

I remember scrutinising photographs of Lynn's sculptures in books and catalogues. Sometimes the same piece appeared in two books but illustrated from different angles which gave me a better understanding of how it was constructed. The connection in my mind was simple. I loved skeletons and bones of all kinds and morbidly collected dead animals that had dried out in the sun, the skin shrinking tightly over the bones beneath. These mummified remains were somehow more redolent of their struggle for life than if they were alive, furred and feathered. To me, Lynn's sculpture was animated by an equal vivacity. His structures seemed a natural and logical way to make an object. Around me I could see other structures that had a similar economy of means; my grandmother's wire egg basket, the tissue paper and bamboo kites I built and the pole and mud constructions of the African houses and granaries.

This fascination gave me a deep empathy with Lynn's working method and may eventually have contributed to the success of my relationship with him, casting his work for over twenty years. The collaboration and close friendship that grew during those years taught me much about sculpture and in particular about working with an artist. This also provided me with a real insight into his sculpture reinforcing and developing those impressions I formed in childhood. In conversation he would let slip anecdotes or quotations that illustrated aspects of his work, but above all the greatest privilege was to witness a sculpture develop and grow from a single rod into a fully formed wire frame that could then be filled and made solid.

Lynn's sculptural language was essentially built around triangles. The stability of a tripod, pyramid or cone, both as an actual form or as a concept to construct other forms, was intrinsic to his method. Juxtaposed triangles extended into squares, rectangles or even larger polyhedrons, could be extended further into three dimensional cage-like constructions creating more organic objects. Illustration In using this language throughout the 1950's he invented his own particular iconography of curious figures and beasts.

With the 1960's came a new sensibility. The mood was of the abstract and Lynn, not insensitive to it, responded in his own way. With an objective eye he looked again at his sculpture and returned to the building blocks of his previous creations, reducing them to their most elemental and combining them in a spare, elegant and eloquent way which was a crystallisation in material form of the simplest visual poetry. Plato described the 'platonic solids' or 'natural objects' as:

"... beautiful not in relation to something else but naturally and permanently beautiful in and of themselves"

In a similar vein, I feel that somehow, Lynn was paraphrasing Plato in divesting the forms from images of the figure. Nonetheless Lynn's work never seems remote or cold. However non -objective and abstract the forms become, they keep a natural, organic tendency to be non-symmetrical, with rich textures and random growths that are witty and playful, warm and generous, providing them with a biomorphic vitality. Lynn has realised significant actual shapes out of the spontaneous forms of his subconscious, Jung's archetypes, inborn 'axes of reference'.

Crucially these forms are the components of both his earlier and his later figures, distilled to their very essence. As such, they hold a simplicity, directness and honesty, and give us access to his sculptural language which was and remains totally unique.

In a more unambiguous way than any of the futurists, Lynn realised Boccioni's much quoted tenet:

"The straight line is the only means that can lead to the primitive virginity of a new architectural construction of sculptural masses and zones"

Drawing is the most immediate of visual art forms and in using straight rods to quickly build up the skeleton of his sculptures Lynn was truly drawing in space. Looking through photographs of his studio at that time and also from my own experience of working with him, it is interesting to see how freely he changed and adapted these frames. Moons became beasts, beasts became conjunctions, frames were destroyed and the rods cannibalised into other sculptures. This free attitude to the form and the deftness of his technique meant he could be playful and uninhibited. Wit and humour, very much part of his character, are also very apparent in his work. Titles, formal juxtapositions and hints at other art forms are all the expression of this wit.

Colour played an important part in the feel and look of Lynn's work and the patination of his bronzes became a major area of communication between us. He detested shiny green or black, the reflective smoothness making the surface look 'greasy' rather than tactile. In order to promote the natural rusting of stolit, the filling compound of his working models, he would paint them with diluted plaster. Lynn explained that used over the surface it whitened the depths and that phosphoric acid would darken the iron rods and rust the iron filings in the stolit.

The reversal of dark and pale was in keeping with and working in parallel with his external armature, the 'inside out', and underlined the exciting newness of his work. It was precisely this earthy natural feel and reversed tones he wanted me to achieve on his bronzes. Of course, this was a challenge I could not resist and numerous experiments followed, most of which failed. We ended up in many blind alleys but the breakthrough occurred with the discovery of Bismuth Nitrate; a temperamental metallic salt that oxidises white and black, depending on the concentration of the applied solution. Controlling it was another matter and it took a lot of patience and determination before finally we had a chemical that achieved the pale depths and darker highlights. We could use it in an endless variety of mixes with other chemicals to obtain the colour spectrum Lynn was pursuing: white to dark, brown to sandy, yellow to grey/green, in dry matt surfaces which exposed the pithy textural skins of the sculptures. Illustration (detail) The metal itself and the handling of the bronzes would provide shine enough without the need for layers of wax, commonly used in the protection of conventional patinas. Of course this meant that some of the patinas would change over time outdoors, but Lynn didn't mind that. He liked the fact that nature took hold and created its own relevance. It was on the indoor pieces that colour was crucial and our quest led to a beautiful range of muted colour that has become characteristic of Chadwick's sculpture.

The abstract nature of the work on which this show focuses was the perfect foil for Lynn's explorations of new form and colour and found final expression in the formica and wood pyramids where facets of bright colour could be set against white. Looking also at the graphic work, one can see that for him, colour is an intrinsically important aspect of expression: acid greens, pale blues, golden yellows and bright oranges all used to great effect in creating mood, character and movement.

"I shall never neglect humanity. Even in my most abstract figure 'The Pyramids' I took man as a starting point" Lynn once said to me.

Many of these abstract pieces have figurative connotations; the stars can be seen as heads with a single eye and the pyramids can begin to suggest a figure or beast.

In perforating some of the pyramids, voids were created forming holes usually of tubular shape. They also carry light and our gaze through the form to the other side. In Monitor he uses this directly as an all seeing eye, while in Pyramid IV the highly reflective surface breaks down the form, our own reflection and the room around us are incorporated into the form and the effect is almost a liquid one. The conical perforations break down the illusions and bring back the strength and simplicity of the sculpture. Gradually the forms became more explicitly human and bestial and transitional pieces such as Monitor III and Beast XXIV are the direct progenitors of the later stainless steel beasts where a variety of pyramids are combined to create a new animal form.

Nearly fifty years after realisation in the mid 1960's this body of work remains very little known and this exhibition is the largest collection brought together to date. It gives us the first in-depth opportunity to reassess Chadwick in a new light and I believe it shows him to be impressively inventive and versatile and completely assured in the use of his visual language. His interest in the way colour and tone, line and texture work with the simplest of forms is an individual and poetic response to the zeitgeist of the time. These sculptures articulate an abstract aesthetic with tremendous energy and originality and I also feel they explore the language of sculpture itself in an unequivocally direct and intuitive way. How strange then that so many have remained in the shadows of his better-known work. Could it be that they presented too much of a challenge to the onlooker than his more obviously naturalistic figures? Perhaps they were overlooked because the association with the untimely death in 1964 of Frances, Lynn's second wife, charged them with unhappy connotations. Whatever the reason may have been, they are now 'Out of the Shadows', exposed to the light and taking their rightful place in an oeuvre that still astounds with its originality, beauty and energy.
